M&A Overview

Sharp Decline in Deal Activity and Valuation Multiples

After a year of steady deal closings in 2022, M&A activity in the Micro Middle Market (“MMM”) exhibited a notable decrease in the first half of 2023 compared to the preceding two (2) years due to a combination of factors, including economic uncertainties and shifting investor sentiments. Persistent economic challenges, marked by supply chain disruptions and inflation concerns, led many potential buyers and sellers to exercise caution, resulting in more modest M&A activity.

Valuation multiples on completed deals decreased notably in Q2 2023, averaging just 6.4x trailing twelve-month (TTM) adjusted EBITDA, compared to 7.7x in Q1 and an average of 7.6x across the prior three (3) years. This recent shift was influenced by the surge in interest rates – as the central bank shifts towards tightening monetary policies to combat inflation, borrowing costs for buyers have increased significantly. Consequently, this higher interest rate environment not only tempered enthusiasm for M&A transactions but also contributed to a pronounced decline in valuation multiples, signaling a notable shift in the investment landscape during Q2 2023.

Despite recent challenges, the lower middle market remains a dynamic space, and the decrease in activity in Q2 2023 can be viewed as a temporary adjustment rather than a long-term trend, with the potential for resurgence as conditions stabilize.

Sector Breakdown

Decreased Volume Across Sectors, Multiples Remain Strong in Healthcare and Business Services

While the broader M&A market cooled off in the first half of 2023, valuation trends have differed across industries. The table below compares TEV/EBITDA multiples in 2022 vs. 1H 2023 in six (6) major industries.

The largest valuation declines occurred in asset-heavy businesses such as manufacturing, distribution, and retail. During the same period, there was a slight increase in multiples paid for business services (B2B) and healthcare companies.

The chart above analyzes deal volume broken down by industry from 2021-2023, with 2023 annualized based on data through Q2. As shown, the decrease in M&A activity has been consistent across the board, with each sector showing year-over-year (YoY) declines since 2021.

Another notable M&A trend has occurred amongst financial buyers in recent quarters. A number of private equity firms have pulled back in 2023, focusing on optimizing their portfolio companies rather than pursuing new platform acquisitions. This has contributed to a notable decline in sponsor-to-sponsor deal activity thus far in 2023.

Leverage

Debt Markets Tighten as Rates Continue to Rise

M&A lending markets have tightened in recent periods due to rising interest rates. Banks and lending institutions have become more selective in their lending practices while requiring a more rigorous evaluation process. This has made it essential for companies to demonstrate strong financial health and a clear strategic rationale for their proposed transactions.

The chart below shows total debt/EBITDA on a rolling four-quarter basis from Q3 2021 to Q2 2023. Inflation in the US peaked in June 2022 at 9.1%, causing the Fed to hike rates more aggressively in the months following, ultimately sending senior debt rates climbing from 4.8% in Q2 2022 to 9.5% in Q2 2023. During this same period, the average total debt on deals declined by nearly a half turn from 4.1x to 3.7x EBITDA.

As illustrated in the chart above, acquirers have used an increasing amount of equity financing to fund their acquisitions as debt markets have tightened. This is another key driver in declining valuation multiples, as higher equity contributions mean buyers aim to reduce purchase price to achieve their target rate of return.
